The live attenuated influenza A/equine/Kentucky/1/81 (EIV; H3N8) strain, designated KY98, was reassessed for use as a vaccine candidate for horses. Modifications of the original KY98 strain were made to enhance stability during aerosolization, improve genetic stability, and increase the infectivity and pathogenicity of the wild-type virus. The modified KY98 (mKY98) virus was genetically stable, induced signs of disease in horses, and induced high HI titers to inactivated EIV. For use in horses, however, an appropriate cell line was needed for efficient propagation of the mKY98 virus. We tested the mKY98 virus for replication in a variety of human and equine cell lines; the virus replicated efficiently in A549 cells and equine KC cells; in each case, no evidence of deleterious effects on cells was observed. The vaccine candidate mKY98 virus replicated well in A549 cells and equine KC cells, was stable, and induced high HI titers to EIV. When administered intranasally, the mKY98 virus did not cause clinical signs or disease in horses. Mice immunized intranasally with the mKY98 virus followed by a booster with the unmodified KY98 virus induced a detectable HI titer against EIV, suggesting that this virus could be used to confer heterosubtypic immunity against EIV strains not present in the mKY98 virus.
